Search It:

Durable links (permalinks) for the sources that have records in Search It

1. For any item in a results list, click on the ellipsis (three dots in the upper right corner)
2. Click on “Permalink” icon
3. Cut and paste the link where you need it
Other Article Databases:

The databases are available from the Find Journal Articles page http://www.libraries.wsu.edu/find-articles. You can go to “Databases A to Z” if you know the name of the database you want, or you can click on “Databases by Subject” to browse sets of databases organized by disciplinary category.

Note that some databases have special permalink features. Here is an example from Academic Search Complete:

Even if your database does not have special permalink features, you can form durable links to articles within the databases by following these steps:

1. While you are on a WSU Campus, copy the URL of your resource
2. Paste the URL in Notepad, or some other word processing application
3. Add this script AT THE BEGINNING of the URL you copied from the database: http://www.systems.wsu.edu/scripts/WSUAll.pl?
4. Cut and paste the link where you need it
Market Sees That Junk Bonds Are, Well, Junk

To the Editor:

In "The Perils of Bashing Junk Bonds" (editorial, May 11), you wrote that a wave of junk bonds is "being sold in such a way that to be able to sell any kind of bond, and that most likely these businesses were started with a combination of..."
Market Sees That Junk Bonds Are, Well, Junk

In my view, the junk bond market is now common not because of the disappearance of Mr. Mitten but rather because the marketplace has finally recognized that junk bonds are not and never have been an exotic alternative to U.S. Treasury bonds but are simply another form of long-term financing. It may not always be easy, or even possible, for a small business to borrow from a bank, but like the proverbial poker table, the only game in town.

RAUL BRENNER